- Training for a management position: A recent study by CareerBuilder.com shows that a whopping 58 percent of managers said they didn't receive any management training. Digest that for a second. Most managers in the workforce were promoted because they were good at what they did, and not necessarily good at making the people around them better. This statistic obviously unveils a harsh reality. We have a bunch of leaders who aren't trained on how to lead. (CareerBuilder)

- How trusting are we of our boss: A Harvard Business Review survey reveals 58 percent of people say they trust strangers more than their own boss. This is truly shocking. We live in a world where cultural trust is at an all-time low, but distrust of leadership should be worrisome to all of us who have jobs. (Harvard Business Review)
